During my unforgettable Erasmus trip to Greece, I experienced a variety of enriching activities and cultural explorations. The journey began with a relaxing day to acclimate to our new surroundings. On Monday, we engaged in team-building exercises and art classes, fostering connections with fellow participants. We enjoyed a vibrant performance by a musical ensemble and explored the central area of Evosmos.

The following days were filled with educational and cultural experiences. We toured the American Farm School, participated in hands-on activities, and visited the unique Venizelou Metro Station. We also discovered the rich history of Thessaloniki, visiting its concert hall, historic churches, and the iconic White Tower. Our final day included a review session, feedback, and some free time to shop and explore before heading back to Malta.

Overall, the trip was a perfect blend of learning, culture, and adventure!

The people at the school were very friendly, including both the children and the members of staff. Everyone made us feel welcome, and it was clear that they had a strong sense of community. The school itself was quite different from what we are used to. The layout of the classes was unique, and the size of the sports pitches was noticeably larger. One surprising difference was that students were allowed to bring their phones to school, which isn't something we usually see. Their dress code was also more relaxed compared to the stricter uniforms we have.

We also visited the farm school, which was a highlight of the trip. It was a beautiful and peaceful place, surrounded by nature. The staff there were passionate about what they do and explained the history of the school and their mission. They aim to teach students the importance of farming and where our food comes from. Their goal is to give young people a better understanding of agriculture and the environment. It was a really eye-opening experience and helped us appreciate how different types of education can be.

Overall, the visit was both educational and enjoyable.
